

Vy Le

Vy Le is a 1.5 generation Vietnamese American. She immigrated to the United States with her parents and grew up in the San Gabriel Valley. She is currently the Community Health Educator at the UCI Chao Family Comprehensive Cancer Center, where she works with oncologists and community partners to increase cancer screenings and prevention for the AAPI community in Orange County. At UCI, she developed and currently oversees a service-learning program that provides community-based participatory research opportunities for public health and medical students that focus on cancer health disparities in underserved communities. She is interested in bridging community-based learning in higher education with public health to train future healthcare professionals on how to provide social justice driven and compassionate care to communities. Vy received her BA in Asian American Studies from the California State University, Fullerton. In her free time, she enjoys taking spin classes, eating delicious food, and trying new boba places and coffee shops.
